ABOUT THE COURSE

Tourism is a vital source of income for many regions and countries. It has become one of the largest industries of the 20th century. Tourism can potentially help create jobs, improve livelihood, and contribute to a nation's economy and nation-building. Tourism also encourages respect for and preservation of nature, culture and heritage.

Over the years, tourism has accelerated development globally, which resulted in severe cultural and ecological damages to the host country. Chowla (2004) mentioned that an essential feature of the tourism industry is its contribution to the national integration and creation of a harmonious social and cultural environment. It also encourages respect for and preservation of monuments and heritage properties." In short, development in tourism must add to prosperity and happiness.

How can we strategies and link culture, nature and community to enhance tourism sustainability? Culture, nature and tourism have a mutually beneficial relationship that can strengthen places, regions, and countries' attractiveness and competitiveness. Culture is an increasingly important element of the tourism product as it creates distinctiveness in a crowded global marketplace. At the same time, tourism provides an essential means of enhancing culture and creating income that can support and strengthen cultural heritage, cultural production and creativity (OECD, 2009). Culture, nature and tourism are linked because of their apparent synergies and growth potential. Nature tourism is often associated with health and wellness, and together with cultural and creative industries, they are increasingly being used to promote destinations.

This short training course will enable the participants to have an interactive sharing session with the practitioners, institutions, and communities, as well to get better insights on the linking of culture, nature and society through tourism.

1. At the end of the course, participants would have a better understanding on:
